The alleged misstatements that incensed Brady were to the effect that he had neglected the child and that when the ambulance surgeon reached the house the sufferer was on a pile of rags in a close room where the only heat was furnished by an oil stoye and all the winfurnished by an oil stove and all the win-dows were closed tight. Brady asserted that the best possible care had been given the child and that the oil heater could be the child and that the oil heater could be explained by the fact that the furnace pipes were out of order. The windows were open, he said, and the child was in a bed. A. J. Long, Brady's employer, corroborated that statement.

Dr. Shults and Dr. Sheehan both said that they did not see a bed anywhere, but that in each instance when they called the child was in the arms of his father.
